One yellow bike

The photo club has a new task. “One bike, two photos,” says the teacher. Alex has a camera. May has one, too. They go to the school yard. A yellow bike is near the gate. “Easy,” says Alex. He takes a photo. “Now you.”

A different picture

My turn again

Alex looks at his photo. It has a bike, a gate, three bags and his own shoe. He puts the camera near the ground. Now the yellow bike looks big. The bags are gone from the picture. “Keep your first photo, too,” says May. “It tells us where we are.”

On the wall

They put two photos on the club wall. Alex uses his first photo. May uses her wheel photo. A student stops. “I know that bike,” he says. Then he looks again. “Wait. Is that our clock?” May smiles. “Yes. Stand here and look through the wheel.”
